« School Education in Japan »

Conférence

Dr Kosuke KASAI

Toyo University, Professeur invité à l'Unistra

In this seminar, I would like to present the realities of school education in Japan and its characteristics from an international comparative perspective.

How do French people view Japanese school education? It is true that, according to international assessments such as PISA, the academic performance of Japanese children appears to be high. This is supported by a nationally uniform school system and a standardized curriculum. However, because this system places excessive emphasis on homogeneity and conformity, it is highly competitive and produces many children who dislike studying.

I plan to present on these realities of Japanese school education and its characteristics in international comparison.
